Learn more about the predator. Find out what the animal eats and how it hunts its prey.

WHERE IN THE WORLD
Out of Asia
Powerful and stealthy, the tiger is the largest and heaviest of the cat family and is much feared by other animals and the humans alike. The Bengal tiger (Panthera tigris tigris) is the most numerous of the five tiger subspecies and has the classic orange and black tiger's coat. Once common throughout Asia, it is now restricted to small areas of India and the surrounding countries.

Ambush predators
Bengal tigers occupy a wide range of habitats. Like all tigers, they rely on dense vegetation to help them stalk and ambush prey; they cannot run for long distances and, unlike lions, they hunt alone. Tigers are the most water-loving of the big cats, which makes them ideally suited to the mangrove swamps of the Sundarbans region between India and Bangladesh. They are powerful swimmers and will talk to the water in pursuit of prey – as many have discovered to their cost.

Habitats
1 Coniferous forest, including woodland
2 Tropical forest and savannah
3 Mountains, highlands, scrub slopes
4 Coastal mangrove swamps, but below the waterline

Range
Most Bengal tigers live in India, but also Nepal, Bangladesh, Bhutan and Myanmar (Burma). The remote, inaccessible Sundarbans region is thought to house the single largest population – up to as many as 500 tigers.

Swamp habitat
The swamps of the Sundarbans, where four mighty rivers flow into the Bay of Bengal, are the natural habitat of the tiger. The mangrove forest is a unique and fascinating environment. It is a swampy, waterlogged area with a complex network of canals and waterways. The tigers are adapted to this environment and are able to swim and wade through the water with ease.
